I am currently working at a job that consists of a lot of repetitive processes that take up a majority of my time. I spend a majority of the day doing the same and related things over and over, and it's starting to get irritating. I think it's getting to the point where I'm just procrastinating, simply because the thought of doing the work is too much. The work being done is very important, but I'd much rather do something else. I'm not sure how to change this, but I've considered trying meditation or something similar. My problem is that I can't have any sort of real, external distractions during work hours. If I am coding it will probably be worse because I'd get so distracted by e-mails and such. I can't switch jobs because of the difficulty of finding something so consistent that's also reasonably close to here in Seattle, Washington. I also can't trade my time, because then the 40-50 hours I'll be making would be for less money than what I currently make (or at least I can't without getting fired). So, is there anything I can do to alleviate the time I spend doing things that aren't making my life or the lives of others better? A: I think this is a very good opportunity for you to practice mindful awareness of your surroundings. Consider practicing mindful awareness of your thoughts, actions and sensations as you are being busy (i.e. "busy hands, busy mind"). Try to notice these things before, during and after a period of time spent at your desk. Consider this as a form of meditation. A: Generally, when facing a significant barrier to productivity, you can ask yourself: What is the worse case scenario that will happen if I don't do this? What is the best case f678ea9f9e
